Girl discovers she has 47 half-siblings from sperm donor father - and gathers many for a 'family reunion' after they found each other online

- Olivia Adams and parents held reunion in Indianapolis-area home
- Unknown father potentially has 48 children after donating 19 years ago
- Six half-siblings now meet regularly as they grow up in different cities
- As sperm donation has become more visible, website has emerged that helps children, donors and siblings find each other
- One man found out that he had fathered at least 75 children

The far-flung children of a man who donated sperm nearly two decades years ago are forming their own sort of community despite not knowing their biological father.

Six of a potential 48 siblings recently gathered at one child's house outside Indianapolis for their third reunion, where the brothers and sisters carved pumpkins and played baseball.

Though the father is unknown, his sperm resulted in 47 pregnancies and at least two sets of twins, meaning that Adams and other attendees possibly have four dozen half-siblings.

The half-siblings who share a sperm donor father gathered at one child's house to get to know each other better. The unknown donor is thought to have 48 children including (from left, in 2013) Kel Shanley, Jack Wildman, Kinsey Presley-Hornung, Olivia Adams

The Donor Sibling Registry, founded in 2000, has connected thousands of sperm donor parents with children after they turn 18.

Though exact numbers of children born via sperm donation are hard to pin down, the practice has increased in frequency and visibility in the past couple decades, along with more lesbian couples wanting to have children.

Donors can remain anonymous if they choose, but website such as DSR have eventually let biological fathers know of possible dozens of kids.

Ben Seisler told Boston.com in 2011 that he learned 75 children after posting his donor number online, but that more babies were still being born with his sperm.

Participants often describe meeting their fathers or siblings as awkward at first, but the Registry regularly posts success stories of relatives becoming friends.

Lori Adams, who had her daughter Olivia, 16, with Patti Case, told Daily Mail Online that her family first became interested in finding siblings in early 2011, and was able to find a group based on their donor within ten minutes.

She said that she knew limited information about the Indiana student before picking him as a donor, but has since learned more about his interests in addition to his genetic makeup.

The appearance of the Donor Sibling Registry website has led many half-siblings to find each other, or their biological fathers. Above, three half-brothers at the Indianapolis reunion.

Lori Adams said that meeting her siblings has helped her daughter have interesting conversations about what being a family means

Most of the families that used the same donors' sperm live in the Indiana area, though others live as far-flung as Texas.

Adams said that a pair of twins in rural Nebraska had posted an image online saying that they loved their mother along with the donor number of their father.

Olivia was able to find her siblings hundreds of miles away after she Googled the same number and found the picture.

Her mother said that while the process of sperm donation does not receive a lot of attention, 'It's everywhere'.

The siblings are happy with their families, but are still interested in their biological roots.

Kinsey Presley-Hornung, 18, who lives in Bloomington, Indiana, can now look for her father officially since she was become an adult, but has had trouble tracking him down or finding records from years ago.

Meanwhile the siblings are getting to know each other in their occasional meetings.

'We have a lot more in common than this guy who donated sperm 19 years ago, so I think that exploring those connections is more important to us,' Olivia told NBC.

Other siblings and mothers have found each other and organized reunions. Above, a group of six mothers who used the same sperm donor and their children visit Niagara Falls

Kinsey Presley-Hornung, 18, said that she does not need to know her father, but her half-sibling Olivia Adams said that she wants to know what he is like. Above, a doctor handles a tube of fertilization sperm

'I don't miss having a father, because I never really needed one. He's kind of like a relative who died way before you were born. You know you're related to them, but there's nothing to really miss,' Presley-Hornung said.

Adams said that the process of meeting her siblings has helped Olivia ask questions and learn about what makes a family, both biologically and otherwise.

The increasing ease of finding people online has led to other reunions, including six mothers who conceived from one donor meeting for a weekend in Niagara Falls.

Kenyea Jones, 44, the single mother of 20-month-old Presley told Click On Detroit that she and the other mothers are 'almost like a sisterhood, like we're in a sorority, a special club, a special mom's club, the donor club'.

Jones says that her son and the other children are 'diblings', for donor siblings.

Despite concerns about accidental incest, there is limited regulation into births from sperm donation.

Other countries restrict the number of children that stem from one donor's sperm, though the US only has medical community guidelines rather than hard and fast rules.

Parents of the half-siblings who gathered at Olivia Adams's house say that they would like more information about sperm donors' medical histories to have knowledge of possible genetic illnesses.

ms, 16, always knew she was conceived by sperm donation. What she didn't know is watch now was 48 others may have the same donor father. Her family hosted a 'family reunion' with some of her half-siblings.

At what point did the parental influence of a father become obsolete? It's irresponsible to not give your child the benefits of both masculine and feminine influence and direction. Especially since the single mothers more likely had father's in their lives

It's just morally repugnant for a man to father so many children. Only a sociopath would think so highly of himself. We need limits and restrictions on IVF now!

I bet when those broke college student kids donated decades ago, they didn't realize they would father dozens of kids. I bet they also didn't realize they would still be fathering kids years later.

After they find out, however, I'm sure they're chuckling. Why would they regret fathering a small army? It's the male fantasy, after all.
